

Nada joined Bousfields in May 2021 as a Project Manager with the Community Engagement practice. She is originally from Vancouver and holds a BA in International Development from the University of Toronto, and a MSc in Urban Design from University College London. Nada has several years of local and international consulting experience, specializing in the co-design of public spaces with vulnerable and racialized communities.

As a Project Manager, Nada offers recommendations to clients throughout the development application process, as they pertain to community engagement, and creates strategies for their implementation. This involves determining public interest in a development project, identifying and liaising with community members, and facilitating dialogue between stakeholder groups. In addition to having development proposals reflect these findings, Nada focuses on making city-building policies and processes more accessible to the public. She works on a variety of projects, including residential, mixed-use, institutional and office, and applies her knowledge to encourage meaningful participation from a range of individuals and groups.
